Presidents Letter

Hello Fellow IMA Members,

The past year has just flown by. It has been a good year for the chapter with many great speakers willing to come and present to us. With the upcoming year there are also many great speakers scheduled and we will again participate in the Rocky Mountain Area Conference for Finance and Accounting Professionals.

The incoming President, Mike Westcott is optimistic about the many events for the chapter the next year. It is great to see him working so hard for the chapter and I know that the chapter will be in very good leadership hands.

I want to thank all of the members who worked so hard this last year to make the Denver-Centennial chapter one of the strongest in the United States. There were so many of you that seemed to always be there and pitch in when we needed it.

The Institute of Management Accountants will offer a discount on the exam fees for the new exam if you take it during the initial period that it is being offered. You can get information at www.imanet.org.

I hope to see you at our May Meeting. The speakers this month are very good and entertaining. If you have not had a change to see them you are in for a real treat.

Thanks for a great year!

Lou Sillstrop

For a Few Dollars More

At the heart of any successful negotiation is mutual agreement. And salary negotiation is simply that-meeting and discussing the subject of compensation with your potential employer to reach an agreement that is satisfactory to both.

Candidates are often reluctant to negotiate for higher compensation because they are concerned they may end up losing the opportunity or damaging their relationship with a future supervisor. However, starting salary is among the most negotiable components of a job offer.

Following are some tips for effective salary negotiations:

- * Know your value. It's important to understand what your skills are worth before negotiating a particular salary. Check the 2004 Salary Guide from Robert Half Finance & Accounting and Accountemps to find out what the expected salary range is for accounting and finance professionals in the United States.
- * Research the employer. Your experience and familiarity with the company's industry, products and services will make you a more attractive candidate and help you better position yourself for a higher starting salary.
- * Do not accept an offer immediately. No matter how perfect you feel the job is for you, tell the employer that you would like to review the details of the offer before you respond.
- * Ask for a review period. If you don't possess the specific background the hiring manager would ideally like, you may have to start at a lower pay level and build a track record. Ask the hiring manager to review your performance after a set period of time and to reevaluate your salary then.
- * Look beyond money. Always consider the offer in its entirety-the base pay as well as health and benefits packages. Also assess the corporate culture and make sure that the job is the right fit for you. These components might make it worth accepting a slightly lower salary.
